

Idealism is the notion that reality is mind-correlative or mind-coordinated. Real objects are not independent of cognizing minds, but exist only as in some way correlated to mental operations.

Realism is the notion that objects exist independently of our experience or our knowledge of them, and they have properties independent of the concepts with which we understand them or the language with which we describe them.